

Task 2 High-Scoring Answer

The article discusses a proposal to replace paper course evaluations with an online system. The university says this change would reduce waste and make evaluation processing faster and more efficient.

However, the woman disagrees with the proposal. First, she believes students won't take online evaluations seriously. She explains that when the forms are digital, students may rush through them or skip them entirely, which would lower the quality of feedback. Second, she says that when evaluations are done in class, students usually complete them because time is set aside for it. But if the process moves online, fewer students may participate at all.

In summary, she opposes the change because she thinks the university will receive fewer and less useful responses if evaluations are no longer done on paper.
